

HALSGROVE RAILWAY SERIES

ROMNEY HYTHER & DYMCHURCH RAILWAY

REPRINT

Andy Stansfield

For eighty years this narrow gauge railway has delighted countless thousands of young and old alike. Its eleven steam locomotives and two diesel engines ply the 13-mile length of track, carrying enthralled passengers between the Cinque Port town of Hythe and the shingle spit of Dungeness with its fishermen's cottages and beach-based fishing fleet.

Based at New Romney where there are workshop facilities and an extensive model railway exhibition, the RHDR is largely dependent upon volunteer enthusiasts whose knowledge and experience they gladly share with the visiting public. A day out on this important part of our heritage is an experience to treasure.

In this departure from his usual style of scenic photography, Andy Stansfield sets out to capture not just images of these historic locomotives but also the background and the people who make this national institution the subject of so much fascination.

No.10 Doctor Syn

Approaching Dungeness

The old lighthouse at Dungeness

Right: St Mary's Bay

Tender
Asking a driver what he carries in his tender is a bit like asking a businessman what he carries in his briefcase apart from sandwiches, but surely it comes down to eggs and oil.

When I grew up...
George and Oliver became friends.
Addict, aged seven and four surgically have the double done what they would like to be when they grow up and are pleased here with driver Mike Jacques who has already achieved that ambition.

Example of a double-page spread.
